SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 13.

SENATOR CONKLING.—Senator Conkling expresses himself as friendly to the administration, but doubtful as to the practicability of the Southern and civil service reform policies. He thinks that there is too much sentiment and too little real work on the part of the administration and that it is time that attention was paid to the actual necessities of the country, and that the little minor question as to whether a postmaster speaks in a caucus might be left on the table for a time. He contrasts the present condition of the administration, its personnel and its supporters with that of President Johnson, and thinks that there is a remarkable historical parallel between them. He thinks it unlikely that events will result in the day of trial of the policy, and that time may show the wisdom of the administration, but he objects to republicans being persecuted and read out by the party because they are of the opinion that the logic of events will show that the time has not yet come for the Southern and civil service reform policy to be engrained into practical policies.

Senator Conkling, it is said, believes that Ohio has been lost to the republicans in consequence of the attitude of the administration. Various reasons for the defeat have been given, but the real reason is that the people are not satisfied with the administration policy. The election will result in sending either Ewing or Pendleton to the Senate, and on that very momentous consequence will result. There was no doubt that there was a clear majority of 35,000 republicans in Ohio, and when the present unpleasantness was over and men had made up their minds not to budgion one another because they differed in opinion those men would vote as they had always voted—with the republican party. But in the meantime great mischief had been done.
